an investigation into the scale and costs of transitioning our energy systems to achieve net zero emissions canada and the rest of the developed world have committed to decarbonizing basic energy systems but do this country s citizens and governments truly understand the sacrifices ahead and are we willing to accept those sacrifices in the name of reducing the impact of climate change will the rest of the developed world take on the necessary costs and will canada forge ahead with decarbonization even if other countries do not carbon change explores this most visceral of public policy choices for canada with a deep dive into recent north american energy and climate policy the enduring impact of the covid 19 pandemic and political processes across the developed world with respect to dealing with climate change risks it offers a dispassionate analysis of the scale and cost of trying to realize the aspiration of decarbonization dennis mcconaghy asks if a more balanced and nuanced approach is possible to mitigate the effects of climate change while still optimally using hydrocarbons to maximize global human welfare in spring 1998 the national round table on the environment the economy initiated a project to examine possible designs for a domestic emissions trading program for greenhouse gases ghg this report describes the five trading program designs developed and the results of their evaluation the options evaluated are voluntary credit trading vct in which some emission sources voluntarily create emission reduction credits by documenting impacts of specific emission reduction or sequestration measures they have implemented and other entities voluntarily purchase some of the credits mandatory performance standards such as ghg per unit of output for large emitters and performance standards for equipment buildings used by small emitters emission reduction credits being created by entities that exceed the standard and used by other entities to help comply with the standards capping the carbon content of fossil fuels other ghg emissions with allowances equal to carbon content held by fossil fuel producers users importers and letting those with excess allowances sell them to those that do not have enough downstream ghg emissions allowance trading with vct excluding transportation and downstream ghg emissions allowance trading with vct and upstream carbon content trading for transportation fuels the appendix includes a report on possible designs for a domestic emissions trading program and descriptions of selected existing emissions trading programs any attempt to restore responsible environmental policies revive and expand our social programs rebuild our crumbling infrastructure and boost our flagging economy will be inadequate unless we also address the need to increase governments fiscal capacity the tax system can also play a key role in closing the gap between rich and poor a gap that is undermining the health of our economy and threatening damage to our democracy until recently many progressive groups including progressive political parties have shied away from advocating for tax fairness and tax reform fearing that the issue is political dynamite right wingers have encountered little opposition to their calls for deep tax cuts especially for the rich and for corporations but the tide is turning public opinion polls tell us that faced with growing inequality and cutbacks to government programs canadians now strongly support tax fairness including higher taxes on the rich and on corporations the great revenue robbery is a collective effort to stimulate much needed discussion about how tax policy can help rebuild our social programs reduce the gap between rich and poor restore environmental responsibility and revitalize our country s democracy
