in an age of transnational economic and political integration it is surprisingly rare to find social scientists reflecting on the lessons of cross national comparison at first glance there may be little to suggest why a comparison between belgium and britain should be instructive the former is a small country geographically located at the heart of europe and housing the putative capital the latter has a large population by european standards but is struggling to reconcile a proud but insular history and special relationship to the united states with the economic imperative of union with the continent yet on closer inspection there are intriguing similarities both countries have learnt some lessons from colonial adventures both contain nations within nations and both have incorporated significant populations of migrants from outside europe since 1945 both in other words have had to confront the challenge of multiculturalism one has had to build an approach from a starting point where a deep rift exists between two constituent nations the other from an equally profound colonial experience which produced a legacy of racial and ethnic categorisation yet the situation is anything but static as britain experiences a resurgence of regional or national pride and belgium confronts the realities of offering citizenship to the descendants of recent migrants book jacket title summary field provided by blackwell north america inc all rights reserved
